A Deeper Understanding of Cannabinoids, Anandamide, FAAH, and the ECS

Everyday new research is being published about medical cannabis and its effect on the Endocannabinoid System (ECS). The ECS is still new to medical academia and is not currently included in medical doctor curriculum. This leaves many medical professionals, pharmacists, and patients alike inquiring how cannabis interacts with humans. There has been some fundamental understanding that is integrated into HPRC staff training.

Anandamide

Anandamide (AEA) is an endocannabinoid produced in the cells of humans. Endocannabinoids are produced inside our bodies, while phytocannabinoids are produced by plants like cannabis. AEA is also found in certain foods like dark chocolate. AEA regulates appetite, pleasure, reward, pain, and sleep in humans. The word anandamide is taken from the sanskrit origin meaning "bliss, joy, and delight". Humans produce AEA after vigorous workouts, especially cardiovascular workouts, and the chemical is involved in the recovery process. AEA and THC have an effect on the CB1 and CB2 receptors in humans, which further explains why THC can modulate appetite, pain, pleasure, and sleep in humans.

Fatty Acid Amid Hydrolase

Fatty Acid Amid Hydrolase (FAAH) is an enzyme that breaks down AEA and THC. The more FAAH present in the human body the more rapid degradation of AEA and/or THC. Understanding the relationship between FAAH and endocannabinoids gives cannabis patients a stronger understanding of how certain times the effects of cannabis may vary based on the levels of FAAH present in the body.

Certain foods can modulate amount of FAAH in the body. These include Maca, Cacao, and Echinacea. Being aware of these herbs and foods that modulate FAAH can also change the potential experiences of a medical cannabis patient who consumes cannabinoid based medicine. Yale University is currently conducting a study with the support of the National Institute on Drug Abuse (NIDA) that is investigating FAAH inhibitors as a treatment to cannabis withdrawal. This would be helpful for patients trying to understand how to reduce their cannabinoid use, avoid withdrawal symptoms, and promote positive experiences with cannabinoids. Considering foods that modulate the amount of FAAH can also offer a unique approach to making cannabis medicine more effective at lower doses.

Keeping THC tolerance levels low may help patients get the best application from their cannabis products, save money, and avoid adverse effects of overmedicating.

As always, patients should work closely with their doctor when considering any changes to their medicine or diet. If you would like to learn more about how cannabis medicine may benefit you stop by HPRC in downtown Arcata or visit our website at www.HPRCArcata.com. HPRC is a better business bureau A+ certified facility, permitted by the City of Arcata, and our budtender staff is TMCI nursing curriculum certified for cannabinoid therapies. We look forward to educating you on cannabis as a medicine and offering you quality customer service in every interaction!

'Enemy of the People'

Editor:

Another day, another story. Soon we'll find the story not credible/fake news/no source/or just never happened. For well over a year, we've heard about the Russian "collusion" with the Trump administration. The FBI, the CIA, the NSA, even Sen. Feinstein, all stated there is nothing to the Russia/Trump "collusion" story: no evidence, no wrong doings, nothing. The lunatic left is saying, "We know there isn't any evidence; that's why we need an investigation to find it." If there's such a thing as MSM sickness, I've got it.

Media Research Center reported 95 percent of the news on Trump has been negative. 95 percent? No bias? Also, for anyone who thinks that the New York Times and Washington Post are journalistic paragons tell your doctor to up the meds. Maybe at one time they were, but not now. A National Enquirer "I Was Impregnated by a Corpse" story is more factual than the hit pieces by the NYT and WAPO. My father's term for these type of papers? Fish wrappers.

The press and Democratic party, which has become a party of radical fascist hate, are doing anything/everything to delegitimize President Trump and the democratic process. Through the book Shattered, we learned Hillary and her staffers hatched the Russian collusion story to explain her loss within 24 hours of conceding the election. It was then fed to the press and voila; Down the rabbit hole we go for a year!

The press is the enemy of the people but also dangerous when it consciously tries to influence the uninformed through innuendo, accusations, character assassinations and even falsehoods. Only 32 percent of people have a "great deal or fair amount of trust in the media," according to a September 2016 Gallup Poll. Journalists need to deal with facts not hearsay. They are failing the people. They're embarrassing themselves. We don't need any more fish wrappers.

'Futile'

Editor:

Recently I and others attended an open meeting of the Humboldt Human Rights Commission to discuss the ongoing great need to secure safe (open) shelter and permanent and appropriate low-cost housing for all the homeless citizens wishing it ("Swept," June 1).

I came prepared, not to argue the problem, but to bring forth common sense and affordable humane solutions. I presented six and the commission recorded them.

A lot of the other discussion degenerated into an "us and them" argument.

I realize now that all my (and others') efforts here were futile as I learned all the commissioners are appointed by each of our districts' supervisors and serve at their pleasure and can be "dismissed" at any time for any reason but, most notably, for being "over-active" and involved" in really trying to make a difference when it comes to citizen abuse and ongoing (oblivious??) government agencies' human rights violations.

I also learned that our HHRC is truly an impotent board with no enforcement powers to even rectify or correct any situation. They are just "talking heads" like all other empty, powerless boards and commissions.

In conclusion, nothing will be done by them. All of them serving know the local problem. They also know how to correct it, simply: Open up all government buildings at night to shelter those in need, provide and make available land for safe and secure camps and tiny house villages, and fight for and install a true department of human rights advocate that will oversee and make sure towns, cities and all agencies provide proper treatment, respect

Neighbors Successfully Sue the Squireses

Meanwhile, the city of Eureka's long-standing case continues its courthouse march

By Kimberly Wear

kim@northcoastjournal.com

Residents along a stretch of G Street say they had one main goal in mind when they grouped together to take Eureka's most notorious landlords to court: They wanted their neighborhood back.

Conditions at two buildings owned by Floyd and Betty Squires on the street had continued to deteriorate, becoming magnets for drug activity and police calls, neighbors say. They saw an uptick in crime and, at times, felt unsafe walking out their doors.

The last straw came in the form of a December shooting at one of the residences that served as a rooming house. Shortly afterward, neighbors filed a series of small claims cases that — after being pared down — left 20 to be heard in court earlier this year.

The effort paid off last week with news arriving in their mailboxes that Superior Court Judge Timothy Cissna had awarded them varying amounts in damages — ranging from around $1,500 to $5,000 — after finding the Squireses failed to properly manage the two side-by-side buildings.

The Squireses, who are already embroiled in a six-year lawsuit with the city of Eureka over conditions at 26 of their rental properties — including the pair on G Street — did not return a phone call seeking comment.

Cissna found that “substantial, credible evidence” was presented during the three-week-long case to show the residences at 1625 and 1635 G St. were “nuisances” for a range of reasons, including drug sales, excessive garbage, dilapidated exteriors, bizarre behavior, fighting, fire hazards and shootings.

During the trial, neighbors took the stand to describe those conditions, along with Eureka Police Chief Andrew Mills and other city officials. At times they were questioned by Floyd Squires, who represented himself and his wife Betty in the case.

"Defendants submitted testimony and evidence that they have put significant effort into maintaining the properties and controlling the numerous issues with the properties," Cissna wrote in one of the rulings, which all contained the same basic language. "I find that these efforts were inadequate and/or short-lived."

The judge cited as an example how both residences were cleared of building code violations in August of 2016 but by January — just five months later — city inspectors had red-tagged the 1635 G St. after finding 200 new code violations.

"Based on the totality of the evidence ... I find that the properties at 1625/1635 were negligently operated, managed and maintained by the defendants and constituted a nuisance," Cissna wrote.

Meanwhile, the city's lawsuit — which was filed against the Squireses in 2011 — continues its slow march through the legal process.

While 26 of the couple's properties are currently under what is known as a receivership, with a third party monitoring repairs, the city has repeatedly asked the court to take further actions, citing continual delays and backslides in the conditions at certain buildings, including 1635 G St., which was condemned in January.

The latest attempt came in February when the city asked Judge Dale Reinholtsen to "take swift action" to remove the current receiver — former county Planning Commissioner Jeff Smith — or require him to "manage and repair the properties in a reasonable and expeditious manner."

Normally, a receiver is given full control over properties — including the ability to collect rent and take out property liens to pay for repairs. Under a sort of hybrid system allowed by Reinholtsen, Smith inspects properties and sets repair plans, but the Squireses retain the financial reins and oversee the process.

That, the city argued for a third time to Reinholtsen, is just not working.

"This has been a long time coming," said the city's outside attorney Krista MacNevin Jee, whose firm specializes in receiverships, adding that the couple didn't even board up 1635 G St. properly and the city had to come finish the job.

At some point, Jee told Reinholtsen, someone is going to be injured.

"It needs to come to a resolution," she said.

Attorney Carlton Floyd, who represented the Squireses at the February hearing, told Reinholtsen that his client has "felt for a long time now that the city is being unreasonable."

"No matter what he does, the city is never happy with it," the attorney said.

Floyd told the judge that Smith was trying to take care of the G Street situation when the city "intervened."

The packed courtroom for the February hearing included local residents, Mills, Eureka Councilmember Kim Bergel and District Attorney Maggie Fleming, who told Reinholtsen that she sent an inspector to G Street in response to a series of complaints.

Fleming said the issues were "very significant" with a "very negative impact on the vulnerable members of our community."

The Squireses are known for renting to individuals with poor credit histories, few resources and scant options in a community plagued with an affordable housing shortage.

"The community really expects something to happen, something to change," Fleming said.

Smith, meanwhile, told the judge he found the G Street situation to be a "case of extreme vandalism" and that he didn't "think it was representative of what's going on at the other properties."

Little about the dichotomy in views presented at the hearing was resolved with Reinholtsen's May 4 interim ruling, in which the judge acknowledged the city's "frustration that repairs have not been completed timely."

He also noted that a "great deal of the discussion at the hearing on the motion" centered around 1635 G St., which had been previously been signed off on by the city.

"To the extent petitioners seek expansion of the role of the receiver, further discussion is required," Reinholtzen wrote.

That interim ruling was followed up with a May 30 status update that listed 22 of the properties as completed — while Reinholtzen cited the new issues at 1635 G St. — and a report on repair plans for the remaining four.

In closing, Reinholtzen told attorneys that another status conference will be scheduled after another supplemental report is filed.

Back on G Street, neighbors said the situation seems to have gotten better.

Ron Kuhnel, who was allotted $4,500 of the maximum $10,000 allowed in small claims cases, said it was never about the money.

"What we hope will happen is he will manage the properties and the problem will go away. That's a lot to hope for," he says. "That change of behavior is out of our power. It's up to the Squireses. Otherwise, he might get sued again."

This is not the first time a group of residents has successfully taken the Squireses to court.

Back in 2014, a judge collectively awarded neighbors of the couple's 833 H St. property more than $100,000 for emotional distress and economic damages, which was eventually settled with Squires' insurance company Lloyds of London.

Kuhnel says things have quieted down at the Squireses' G Street properties in recent months, a trend he hopes will continue, as do others in the neighborhood of historic homes.

"Right now, frankly, it seems to be doing very well at this moment ... and we are very thankful for that," he says.

Lori Regalo, who has lived on the street for 20 years, agreed.

She emphasized that the case was never about the people living in the residences, some of whom she says felt powerless to stop what was happening, but holding the Squireses responsible.

Regalo, who was awarded $3,000, says the trial was grueling but there was also a silver lining: The whole process brought the neighborhood closer together.

"I'm proud of us all," she said. "I hope other neighborhoods who have this same sort of problem look at this and say, 'Maybe we should do that.'"

Medical Community Needs to Engage on Cannabis Regulation

By Bill Boerum

views@northcoastjournal.com

The California Bureau of Marijuana Control recently held in Eureka the first of four state-wide hearings scheduled to receive local and regional input on draft regulations for medical marijuana it issued at the end of April. The 45-day comment period ends June 13.

Following the enactment of the Medical Cannabis Regulation and Safety Act in October of 2015, the Bureau's charge as the lead agency on medical marijuana has been to focus on the regulatory infrastructure for licensing operators in several areas: cultivation, processing and manufacturing, dispensaries, delivery and testing. The deadline for implementation is Jan. 1. The rule-making and implementation is challenged by the passage of the adult use initiative last November. Gov. Jerry Brown, wisely, has insisted that there be only one regulatory regime. There are a number of bills — I understand as many as 40 — relating to marijuana currently pending in the Legislature. As a practical matter, the governor's budget bill is likely to reconcile the existing statutes, pending bills and contentions, and not necessarily to everyone's satisfaction.

Amid the legislative and special interest group jostling in Sacramento for almost two years, the incumbent healthcare industry (hospitals and medical groups) largely has been absent from the policy dialogue on medical cannabis. The exception was that, in the contest last year over Proposition 64 (adult use of marijuana), the California Medical Association (physicians) supported it, while the California Hospital Association opposed it. Otherwise, there has not been dialogue or advocacy from the healthcare industry. The California Department of Consumer Affairs Medical Board has a Marijuana Task Force but its activity has not been generally notable.

However, as an individual with experience in healthcare governance and healthcare's challenges and opportunities, I am a supporter of medical cannabis. I believe it to be effective for curative and palliative treatments for a number of medical conditions across the population, from children to the elderly. There are a number of conditions that can be treated with successful results, though unfortunately, to date, there has been only scant scientific validation of the benefits. The evidence or validation, though expressed passionately and often convincingly, has been anecdotal, scattered and testimonial in nature. However, certain conditions were recently identified as treatable by cannabis in a report from the National Academies of Sciences as: chronic pain, post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), sleep disorders, anxiety, epilepsy (including severe childhood epilepsy), nerve pain, chemotherapy-induced nausea and vomiting, Tourette's syndrome and glaucoma. I would venture that the opioid epidemic might be alleviated by the use of cannabis, too.

In the interest of spurring the beginning of dialogue on the use of medicinal cannabis by the incumbent healthcare providers and more specifically to review and comment on the bureau's draft regulations, the Northern California Healthcare Authority decided to conduct a webinar for its members' governance trustees and hospital administrators. The authority is a joint powers organization of five healthcare districts and hospitals in the three counties of Sonoma, Mendocino and Humboldt. The Mendocino and Humboldt constituents are the Southern Humboldt Community Healthcare District and the Mendocino Coast Healthcare District, each with a hospital.

The Health Care Authority conducted a 90-minute webinar with six knowledgeable panelists, each with an insightful point of view on a specific medical cannabis domain, such as treatment results, patient access, industry challenges and opportunities, and testing. In sum, the concerns expressed about the draft regulations (with which our panelists were quite familiar) were regulatory over-reach and high taxes and fees. Each of these could inhibit the development of medical cannabis as a robust alternative to prescription and other therapies. Over-regulation and high prices could keep the black market alive and, at the same time, force out small legacy growers, producers and providers.

Personally, my hope is that the regulations will bring this established though nascent industry, which has become rooted in Northern California, out into the open. The regulatory framework needs to be supportive of its pioneers in the North Coast who are the main small businesses sustaining the regional economy. Importantly, the regulatory regime needs to be a framework to develop a vibrant "medical" cannabis practice. Frankly, from my point of view, despite the thorough coverage of several critical areas in the draft regulations, I do not see explicit encouragement for medical cannabis best practices. As much as I'm sure the bureau has worked hard to write effective regulations to address the critical issues embodied in the enabling legislation, I likewise hope it will strive for the development in California of the nation's best medical cannabis practice for the benefit of patients, and to have more patients confidently receive treatments from the different modalities of cannabis.

In the meantime, medical practitioners need to quickly engage with the developments underway. ●

Home-court Advantage

By Thadeus Greenson

thad@northcoastjournal.com

Get your shovel ready — the days of buried cannabis cash may soon come to an end. Congress is set to consider a bipartisan amendment that would allow federally regulated banks to do business with marijuana companies without fear of regulators cracking down. The amendment, authored by Florida Republican Matt Gaetz and Democrat Darren Soto, is tacked onto the Financial Choice Act, which guts many of the Dodd-Frank regulations ushered in by the Obama Administration in the wake of the 2008 financial crisis, and would prohibit federal agencies from discouraging or penalizing banks taking deposits from cannabis businesses that are legal under state law.

If passed, the bill would be a huge win for the cash-heavy cannabis industry, which for decades has grappled with the banking prohibition due to marijuana's status as a Schedule 1 drug under the Controlled Substances Act. In addition to making it very difficult for growers and operators of cannabis businesses to get loans, buy homes and the like, the prohibition also comes with a host of security concerns, necessitating armored trucks, guarded warehouses and buried loot.

The bill may get a vote in the House as soon as June 8.

It looks like the Cleveland Cavaliers might not be the only thing getting smoked in the NBA Finals.

Multiple media reports broke after Game 2, which saw the Golden State Warriors drub the Cavaliers and mighty LeBron James by 19 points to take a 2-0 lead in the best of seven series, that the visiting locker room of Oakland's Oracle Arena had a pungent and unmistakable smell. "It wasn't a dead skunk," tweeted a senior writer with ESPN. "I grew up in Northern California and Hawaii. I know what cannabis smells like."

The source of the aroma is unclear — it could have been a Cavs player, a team staffer or a member of the media. But with the Warriors' sparkling 42-4 home record since Election Day, some are surmising this is all part of the team's home-court advantage.

Speaking of home-court advantages, it seems Eureka is considering ceding its.

As the Journal went to press, the council was set to discuss a staff recommendation that the city ban recreational use cannabis dispensaries within city limits once they become legal next year. The recommendation is a bit of a head-scratcher, as staff is recommending that the council OK manufacturing, testing and transportation within city limits. So it's clearly not a moralistic stance.

But why ban dispensaries and the sales tax revenue that comes with them, especially if you're the seat of a county universally renowned for its marijuana that's constantly talking about boosting tourism?

In the latest sign that marijuana has gone yuge, a cannabis joke has landed on a McDonald's billboard in New Mexico. Seriously.

The billboard, positioned alongside Interstate 25, boasts an image of the fast food giant's new egg and chile stuffed breakfast burrito with the quip, "Usually, when you roll something this good, it's illegal."

Media reports have not indicated who owns the particular McDonald's franchise in Raton, New Mexico, or if said owner has faced a corporate backlash. But it seems a pretty brilliant marketing ploy. The billboard is located just about 10 miles south of the Colorado state line, ensuring that all those New Mexicans who daytrip it north for a legal puff return to an image of a gigantic burrito and a pithy pot joke.

Up and Down Old Town

Eureka Police officer Cory Crnich's beat stretches from Eureka's Fourth Street north to the bay, from East Commercial Street to the library. Being the Old Town officer is a specialty position, one Crnich applied and reapplied for. He took the job in May of 2016, one week after the PalCo Marsh eviction. There's no pay bonus but there are, according to Crnich, "unique opportunities and difficulties" that make it different from a regular patrol position. Four days a week, beginning at 8 a.m., Crnich walks up and down his beat, checking in on the people passed out in doorways, smoking at the Gazebo and making their way toward St. Vincent de Paul for food.

"It requires a little more patience than standard patrol work," says Crnich. "There are two different extremes you're working with, indigent folks and small business owners."

The community policing practiced by Crnich, much of which involves just talking to the people he encounters in Old Town, learning names, faces and habits, and forming relationships, has shown its value over the last year, as in a Jan. 5 incident in which a man called in a threat of a mass shooting at or near the Humboldt County Courthouse. After reviewing surveillance footage of the gas station pay phone from which the threat came, Crnich recognized one of his Old Town regulars — Bobby Ladd — and officers were able to find and detain him. Ladd was cited and released then connected with mental health services.

After dropping off his paperwork at the EPD annex at Third and E streets on April 3, Crnich begins his beat by talking to two men in a nearby alley, who are sleeping next to a set of steps. A giant bag of popcorn sits nearby, with kernels scattered about their feet. Crnich calls the men by name, asks the man who's sleeping with one leg sticking out of a blanket to wake up.

"It's time to go, guys," he says. "I'm not going to see this cart later, am I?"

One man begins picking up the popcorn, piece by piece. Crnich asks the other man if he has been working with his Mobile Intervention Services Team worker. He shrugs.

"Why didn't you go to mission last night?" Another shrug.

"What's your plan for the day, Chris?"

"Free meal."

"OK, that's at 11. What about after that?"

"Clothes."

Chris walks away down the alley, the blanket thrown over his shoulder. Crnich continues his beat, knocking on the door of an RV parked along Third Street. An older man opens the door and Crnich explains that there's no camping on city streets. The two talk about where to park, about an upcoming funeral the man has come back into town to attend. As they talk, Chris wanders out the front door of another building, a small house divided into apartments and missing a lock on the front door.

Crnich walks down C Street to Madaket Plaza and talks to three men huddled with a dog under the awning of Jack's Seafood. He asks their birthdates, where they came from. One, a 20 year old, says he was recently kicked out of a clean and sober house.

"What are your plans? Like your life plans?" Crnich asks him.

"I want to go to school, finish and go to college."

Crnich claps his hands together once, briskly.

"Well then you have a plan for the day," he says. "You're going to find out where Adult Ed is and find out how to get back into school."

He tells the two men to figure out what they're going to do and stick to it.

"You're too young for this," he says.

"The longer you're out here the harder it is to get out."

Farther down the boardwalk, the officer stops to talk to a middle-aged man with a camping backpack and stainless steel water bottle. The man says he's just traveling through from Indiana, seeing the country.

"Do you smoke weed?" Crnich asks him. "It's not a trick question. People will offer to smoke you out, then steal your stuff here."

He encourages the man to be careful and keep moving. The rest of the beat is similar, the faces familiar, the stories broken records. A man in a tracksuit and open bathrobe asks him for change. Crnich

Hello, My Name is:

Say hello to Humboldt's flying squirrel, formerly known as the northern flying squirrel. Look into his black, marble-like eyes. Look at them. Smaller and darker than the northern variety, with which they share some territory, these little gliders have just been classified as a new species and named for our county namesake, naturalist Alexander von Humboldt. Read more on this and other stories at www.northcoastjournal.com.

quiets him when he begins to swear and yell, investigates where he's come from (San Francisco) and asks if he'd like to go back. In front of Los Bagels, an elderly woman sits on a walker, asking for change in defiance of the city's panhandling ordinance. As Crnich stops to talk to a regular, a departing customer hands the woman a dollar behind his back.

A call comes in from dispatch reporting an RV parked in front of Pacific Choice Seafood. When Crnich talks to the man sleeping there, he says he's an employee at the fishery. As they sort it out, there is movement near the loading dock. Two men begin to disassemble a makeshift camp with a tarp attached to the fence. A hypodermic syringe rests next to a hunk of watermelon and a burned out metal mixing bowl. Crnich calls the men by name, watches as they pack up and begin to move down the street. There's not a whole lot he can do about the needle, he says, since state penalties for drug offenses have been deprioritized.

On the other side of the yard, employees moving pallets with a forklift ask the officer what to do with the needles they found. A bin of scrap wood is swimming with them. Crnich suggests they call the local harm reduction group to see if they'll get them.

On Third Street, in front of St. Vincent de Paul's free meal, people hang out and fix bikes. They camp, they smoke, they yell. Crnich knows local business owners are unhappy, but ponders what would work best.

"Where should I send them?" he asks. "The Gazebo?"

As he walks back up First Street toward the Gazebo, a man on a bike flags him down. Someone stole his cruiser, he says. He had it near his camp and someone took it. Could Crnich keep a look out for it?

"I think the universe is giving you a sign you should have less bikes," Crnich says, only half-joking. But he agrees to keep an eye out.

Masterpiece

An arrest, a police chief, a defendant and a conversation that can change a community

By Thadeus Greenson

thad@northcoastjournal.com

It was an atypical meeting, with the police chief sitting across from the defendant in the chief's office. The captain in charge of patrol sat nearby as the two, in kind, measured tones, discussed the matter at hand.

Six days earlier, the chief's officers had arrested the 57-year-old defendant — Christopher “Blaze” Boyle — shortly after dusk on the railroad tracks that flank Eureka's Waterfront Drive, alleging that he obstructed an officer and violently resisted arrest. Boyle, however, sees the incident differently, insisting he was compliant and nonthreatening in the face of aggressive officers who — with fear and anger in their eyes — traumatized him and lied about it.

Over the course of about an hour, the two men talked about closed feedback loops, humanity, decency, respect and community policing. When they emerged, Boyle took to Facebook, where he called Eureka Police Chief Andrew Mills a “bright and careful thinker” and a kind man. Mills, in turn, called Boyle an “amazing guy,” touting his creativity and sensitivity.

Together, Mills wrote, he and Boyle of his May 2 arrest.

have the opportunity to change the community, to “make a masterpiece.”

A month later, the charges against Boyle — a felony and a misdemeanor — both remain pending.

“Chief Mills, my trust in your department is badly broken.”

— Boyle in a May 3 letter to Mills

The sun had just set as Boyle, an artist and craftsman, left the waterfront restaurant Vista Del Mar on the evening of May 2 and wandered across the street to the old graffiti strewn locomotive, what Boyle calls “a rusted icon to more productive times,” that sits perched on the edge of the Balloon Track. Without much thought, Boyle said he decided to climb on top of it to watch the stars come out. He’d been up there a short time when he found himself in the glare of the spotlight from a police officer’s patrol car. Boyle said he figured it was time to get down, fully expecting the spotlight was just a visual prod for him to keep moving.

When he climbed down, Boyle was confronted by an officer — later identified as Sgt. Lenny La France — who was shouting commands at him and had his Taser drawn and trained on Boyle, its red laser sight shining in his eyes. Boyle maintains he was compliant — responding to La France’s commands and questions with, “yes, sir,” and “no, sir” — and tried to explain he is a father, a local business owner and a law abiding citizen.

The particulars of Boyle’s and the officers’ account of the incident differ. The three officers who responded to La France’s call for backup had body-worn cameras on but La France did not, as he came across Boyle on his drive to work and hadn’t yet checked out a camera. But footage of the incident seems unlikely to shed much light. It first shows Boyle on his knees on the tracks, his hands being cuffed behind him. He’s then raised to his feet and escorted to a patrol car parked on the road.

A dog barks incessantly as an obviously distraught Boyle talks — repeating his address, that he’s a business owner, that he’d done nothing wrong. The cops seem disinterested in conversation. When they arrive at the patrol car, one starts the process of patting Boyle down and then something happens. The officers claim Boyle lunged at one of them but the only footage that captures the moment is from an officer’s camera that’s trained on Boyle’s back. All it shows is Boyle turning slightly before being pushed forward onto the hood of the vehicle. An officer then yells at Boyle for kicking him in the leg — apparently alleging that Boyle, his chest pushed down on the hood of the car, kicked backward at the officer’s lower leg. Boyle then cries out as an officer wrenches his wrist in the cuffs in a pain compliance hold and urges him to stop resisting. The officers then finish frisking him, causing Boyle’s pants to fall to his ankles, and load him into the back of the patrol car. Boyle’s pants would remain around his ankles until an officer helps pull them up before walking him into the jail a short time later.

Boyle was booked into jail at about 10 p.m. on May 2 and released about 12 hours later, having spent most of the night shivering alone in a cell, where he stood on his folded up socks in an effort to keep the concrete floor from wicking away his body heat. Shortly after his release, he started writing a letter to Mills.

Mills, for his part, declined to comment on the specifics of Boyle’s case other than to say that during stressful incidents, people’s perceptions can vary greatly. He said prosecutors felt there was enough evidence to charge Boyle in the case and, ultimately, the question of guilt will be up to a jury.

“At a time when civility seems to be at a very low point nationally, it is nice that two people can sit down, discuss a difficult topic and even laugh together. There was no trenching for position, but genuine dialogue. Discourse such as this brings hope.”

— Mills’ May 9 response to Boyle

Eureka Police Chief Andrew Mills.

During his years as a commander with the San Diego Police Department, Mills developed a reputation for being accessible. He walked neighborhoods to hear people's concerns and was known to give out his email address and urge people to contact him directly with problems. This accessibility is one of the core tenets of community-oriented policing, a concept Mills has largely devoted himself to during his 30-plus years in law enforcement. So those around Mills weren't shocked when he responded to Boyle's letter with an invitation to come talk about it.

Mills said he was struck by aspects of Boyle's letter that seemed to reach for solutions, for unity, and the parts that spoke to the ties that should bind police to those they serve.

"He was someone who appeared to be trying to be constructive rather than destructive, who appeared to have been horribly offended but was willing to be part of a solution rather than just throwing bombs," Mills said. "That's the kind of interaction that I thrive on because I think it makes us better as a city, better as a police department and better as a people."

When the two sat down together, Mills said he was struck by Boyle's willingness and ability to see things from a police perspective as they talked about de-escalation, respect and the grind of a cop's job. "This is a guy who truly cares about people, including the officers that contacted him," Mills said.

"There will always be an argument for a coarser hand, yet in every conflict it is incumbent on the stronger party to exercise patience, and strive for understanding. It is a notion at the core of civility."

— Boyle's May 3 letter

Last year, Eureka police combined to contact more than 51,000 people, either through calls for service or officer-initiated contacts, like traffic stops. In those, officers reported using force 253 times. That's less than half of 1 percent of the time.

EPD Capt. Brian Stephens recently broke the numbers down for the city council, explaining force includes everything from displaying a firearm or a Taser to pain compliance holds, and just about everything in between. About 60 people reported being injured by EPD officers last year, with ailments ranging from a gunshot wound to knee abrasions. Meanwhile, 23 officers were hurt in use-of-force incidents last year, with injuries ranging from concussions to scrapes.

Officers in the field exercise tremendous discretion in all kinds of area, from whether to contact that person jaywalking to how to contact that person jaywalking. Nowhere is this more evident than in use-of-force situations, where officers have to quickly decide whether force is warranted, what type of force would be most effective and how to use it without hurting themselves or the suspects.

"They have an extraordinarily difficult job where they sometimes have to go from respect to very clear hostility in microseconds because that can literally save people's lives," Mills said. "The hardest part to teach is judgment of when to do that, because it's really time in the saddle. It doesn't come overnight."

Boyle also pointed out that these instances of police force don't just cause physical injury, they can traumatize those on the receiving end. While he once relished the simple beauty of late night walks — the stars overhead or the reflection of the moon on the water — Boyle said his May 2 arrest left him jittery.

"It robbed me of a presence of mind," he said. "I used to feel totally comfortable walking the streets at night. Now — and this is what women go through all the time — I'm walking around looking over my shoulder. It's, 'Check your six.'"

"That's what it all comes down to — they're inflicting this trauma and don't realize how deep that trauma runs because they deal with all this shit all the time and see sadness and anger reflected back at them."

In his post responding to one of Boyle's letters, Mills conceded that officers' past experiences shape how they handle situations. And people make mistakes.

"I have been shot at, stabbed, had stitches in my head and broken my wrist and elbow while making arrests," Mills wrote. "These past experiences shape how I handle people and when to make snap judgments to ensure self preservation. Sometimes my judgments are wrong ... I changes you.”

— Mills’ May 9 response to Boyle

Sitting in the Journal office on a recent Monday morning clad in some blue work pants and a red flannel, Boyle shifted his slight 130-pound frame in his chair and seemed to choose his words carefully. “I understand it’s hard to be a cop,” he said, reasoning that officers are confronted daily with society’s failings, from the “walking dead” of methamphetamine addiction to the severely mentally ill.

The stress can wear them down, Boyle said, until they project fear and anger, which people in turn project back at them. It’s a closed feedback loop that can lead to trauma.

Mills doesn’t disagree.

“Many [officers] crack under the oppressive weight and the long-term grind of stress,” he wrote in one of his replies to Boyle. “In policing you get small doses of hell for sustained periods of time. Cops feel like a frog boiling to death in the cauldron of cumulative stress.”

Mills pointed out that EPD recently started a wellness program aimed at helping officers cope with the stress and trauma of the job through counseling services and peer mentorships. Additionally, he says the department is actively working to foster a culture of positivity that nurtures officers.

Years ago, while running his own glass contracting business in Arizona, Boyle took a weekend-long program through Omega Vector, which aims to teach “the art of self-knowledge” through a Socratic questioning technique in a group setting. Boyle said the program was hard but had a lasting impact, leaving him with more confidence and a great sense of self. After spending hours thinking about his arrest — the first in his life — and how to break this “closed feedback loop” he sees with police, not just locally but across the country, Boyle said he’s looking to bring something like Omega Vector to Humboldt.

Ultimately, Boyle says officers need to learn not to discern which suspects or citizens are to be treated with respect and which need a heavy hand, but that all contacts should come from a place of respect. That takes confidence and purpose, which can be taught and built.

“The question,” he said, “is how do you make moral excellence contagious?”

“This trust, so badly bruised, can be rebuilt.
Strive for that.”

— Boyle’s May 3 letter to Mills

His bright blue eyes gleaming, Boyle says he has a happy, rewarding life. He teaches the art of stained glass at Blue Ox Millworks and just stepped down from the Kinetic Grand Championship's board of directors, wanting more time to work on his novel. He performs with fire and is deeply involved in local underground arts communities. He wasn't looking for a cause, he says.

But Boyle also seems like the kind of person who pours himself into things where he thinks he can make a difference. As an example, he started going to Burning Man — the eclectic annual festival that sees an artistic city of tens of thousands of people erected in the Nevada desert then disappear without a trace — about 15 years ago. He wound up on staff and spent the last 10 years managing the festival's airport, a delicate affair that had to navigate the boundary between Burning Man's cashless, ruleless ethos and the rigid world of pilots, police and federal regulations.

So Boyle doesn't seem inclined to walk away from this by reaching a plea deal and quieting down. He realizes that while this isn't a typical conversation that he's started, he's also not a typical defendant. He's not marginalized — he's a housed, employed and educated white male — and has the privilege to take a stand. Mostly, he said he wants to make Eureka an example for others to follow. By engaging with Mills and publishing their correspondences on his Facebook page, Boyle has already started a conversation. It's one Mills seems eager to engage in.

But Boyle is also clear that he wants to see change not just conversation. In a follow up note to Mills after their conversation, he pondered whether the traits he lamented in the behavior of local officers are trained into them or simply a "product of the seeming futility for mortal men to hold law." If it's the latter, he told Mills their work is clear and the chief has his support.

Mills responded.

"Blaze, the EPD ship is turning. Some people may not think fast enough, yet I ask for your continued support and positive interaction. I appreciate how you ended your email to me, and I quote it here. 'The line is one to be illuminated in the field of ethics and painted on the streets of our cities, for ultimately that is the arena where right and wrong is filtered.' We as a community are painting the mosaic of Eureka together. The streets are our canvas and our interaction is the paint. You me and those reading this Facebook post are the artist plying brush to canvas.

"Let's make a masterpiece."

Boyle is scheduled to be arraigned June 14.

Mussel Bound

Put away your clam diggers — domoic acid has put the local clam digging party on hold and mid-calf pants are hard to pull off anyway. But this is not to say shellfish is off the table. In fact, let's take a moment to appreciate the other mollusks that are so often overshadowed by our glamorous local oysters. (Oh, don't pout, oysters — you have a whole festival so sit down a minute.)

Our county runneth over with chowder. Not all of it is good. (Psst, cooks: If you can stand a spoon in it, ease up.) On the other hand, Salt Fish House (761 Eighth St., Arcata) has a solid entry with thick bacon and tender clams that is luxuriously creamy ($9). You would not be in the least bit deprived ordering it for dinner with a salad.

But look outside at the weather. The days of chunky fisherman sweaters before nightfall are behind us for now. (Maybe forever — we're apparently leaning in on climate change these days.) Drop a layer and ask for the curry mussels ($14). The enamel bowl is splashed over with a light red Thai-style curry sauce, chopped cilantro and fresh jalapeño slices. Swipe up extra coconut-rich sauce with the grill-striped bread (ask for it lightly done if you mind a dark char). As for the mussels themselves, they are steamed to a lush plumpness and are full of briny, earthy flavor. That's a luxury, too.

The Upside Down

In the 1950s and 1960s, sweeping into a dining room or a backyard barbecue with a cinched waist and pineapple upside down cake for company was the height of suburban hosting. The magazine clippings and index cards bearing recipes for America's own version of tart tartine could have built a land bridge to Hawaii. But after a couple of decades, the maraschino-studded cake fell on hard times, considered as tacky as the tiki torches stashed in the back of the garage. I blame burnout on fake luaus and widespread use of box cake mix, both of which are the worst unless you are under 6 years old.

Like many mid-century marvels — teak tables, movie musicals — Pineapple Upside Down Cake is making a comeback.

Like many mid-century marvels — teak tables, movie musicals — it's making a comeback. (Note to food magazines: I see you trying to bring back aspic and that's a hard no.) The bundt version at Polynesian-style barbecue joint Sammy's BBQ (1709 Fifth St., Eureka) makes a solid case for the return of the pineapple upside down cake ($3.50). The homemade yellow cake, whipped up by the family matriarch, is firm, eggy and dotted with chunks of fruit. The top has the requisite rings of pineapple and the sticky, caramelized brown sugar. Those of you scowling at the maraschino cherries, I would like to remind you that throughout childhood you guzzled Shirley Temples for the cherries floating therein and fought with siblings over possession of the sole gleaming cherry atop a shared banana split. Let yourself enjoy it. If you're too full from ribs and kalua pork, order a piece to go. You've got a comeback in you, too. ●

Subjective Realities at the Sanctuary Arcata

By Gabrielle Gopinath

artbeat@northcoastjournal.com

Viewing Subjective Realities at the Sanctuary Arcata feels like passing through a wind tunnel time machine. All major 20th-century sculptural tropes come at you at once, revenants with their wires crossed and their channels remixed. Erin Flyer's neo-primitivist wood relief recalls the shapes Gauguin carved above his hut in the Marquesas; it sits across from Billy Conn's welded steel sculpture assembled from scrap in the manner pioneered by abstract expressionists in the 1940s. Suspended like plumb weights in order of decreasing scale, Julie Fleck's crystalline volumes feel like a sanctuary within the Sanctuary. Across the room, Shane Donaldson's grungy assemblage centers around a stuffed toy gorilla that looks like something a carnie at an evolution-themed amusement park might have used to gin up punters in the 1970s.

This rambunctious group exhibition is pulsing with energy and ideas; it needs to be, to hold its own within the Sanctuary's cozy, busy alt-folk precincts. Organized by Sanctuary Arts Director Rory Cullifer and Programming Director Cyrus Smith, and curated by Benjamin Funke (who is, full disclosure, my partner), Subjective Realities surveys three-dimensional artwork by 18 students and recent graduates of College of the Redwoods and Humboldt State University. Jewelry and sculpture appear side by side, while painting, drawing and video are excluded.

It's not easy to extract a single theme from the visual clamor, but one involves the tendency to re-present and romanticize objects from a lost industrial past.

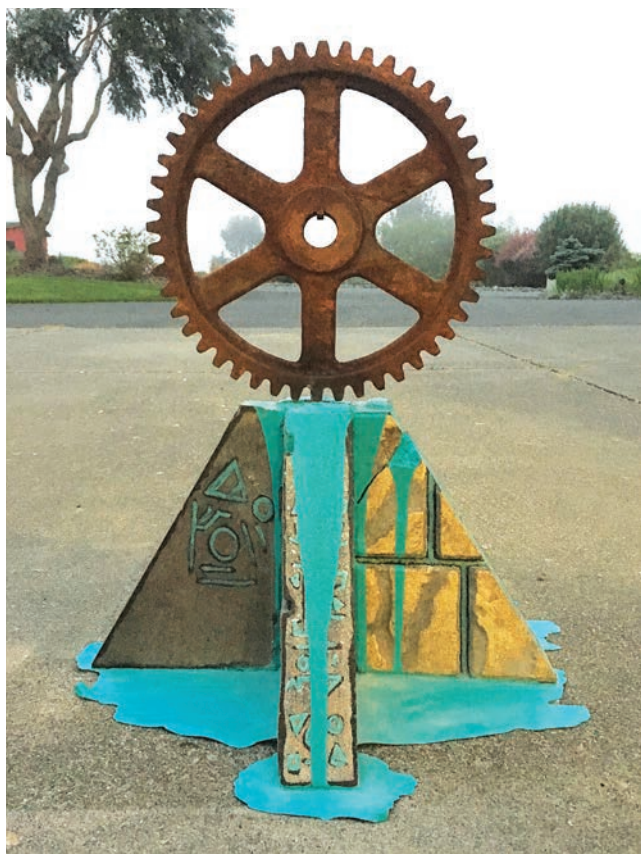

Gears, rivets and horseshoes are raised on pedestals and brandished like talismans.

The interactive sculpture that dominates the exhibition's main space, an optical device by Jillian Ram-mell, is built around a reclaimed heater coil. The perforated wide-bore tube may suggest a telescope from afar, but this turns out to be more an instrument for interior navigation. A wishbone is suspended in the instrument's mid-section and a kaleidoscopic array with your own tiny likeness at its heart is revealed when you peer inside, thanks to a convex mirror.

Billy Conn draws on years of experience as a blacksmith to make his welded metal sculptures, two of which can be seen here. "Outrospection," a tall black humanoid form standing erect on stilt-like quad legs, holds mirrored disks to the sky as though waiting for the aliens to reach out — another sculptural situation where the difference between the instrument and its user (or maker) is elided.

Colette Beaupré carves wood into small, elegant freestanding sculptures, opening holes inside rounded nodes of laminated plywood that show the material's tiger stripes to best advantage. These wooden pieces point to nature more insistently than most of the other sculptures here; they come across like refined reconstructions of the wave-smoothed, pebble-sized redwood beads that line our local beaches.

Nick Hemphill's "Oneiric Sigel Fountain" poses a rusty machine wheel on top of a steel base shaped like a Mayan ziggurat. The base is splashed with aqua blue acrylic polymer that condenses into Keith Haring-style hieroglyphics here and there. The components look like a mathematical equation when they're stacked vertically, with an icon for industrial modernity in the numerator position and an equally app-ready icon for indigenous world systems in the denominator place below.

The approach is not subtle, but the theme is undeniably of our moment.

Preoccupation with technologies of the industrial past makes a certain sense for people who have grown up in the 21st-century United States, with manufacturing long since gone, service-industry jobs representing most of what's available and professional elevation often defined as getting a job where you interact with screens instead of working with your hands. Now that we inhabit a mediaverse in which presidential speech is couched in tweets, undertaking the laborious process of making something — anything — with your hands is a bold, even bolshy move.

Don't miss Craig Howarth's flayed and butterflyed Converse high-tops, pinned flat on the wall in groups as if awaiting tanning; they seem like the stuff of ritual for tribes that we may yet become.

Subjective Realities will be on view at the Sanctuary Arcata through the end of June. The exhibition is open to the public on Saturdays during Open Lab hours from noon to 6 p.m. as well as during all Sanctuary events and performances. Electric-acoustic “mayhem” are on the bill this evening at the Mad River Brewery Tap room in Blue Lake at 6 p.m. Returning to the outdoor stage is Kaptain Kirk's Kosmic Koncoction, which will be jamming the eclectic tunes free of charge. Three hours later, David Dondero — whom NPR hailed as one of “the best living songwriters” about a decade ago — is making a visit to the Miniplex stage in Arcata. With 12 albums to his name, Dondero has a similar rambling spirit to his songs that represent the classic storytelling tradition of Americana troubadours kicking down the dusty dirt roads sidwinding along long silent train tracks. He's joined by local hero and quirky joyful songwriter John Ludington and fellow locals Kids Eat Free for this $10 sliding scale show.

Friday

Arts! Arcata is in full swing tonight and perhaps before you make it down to the plaza, you can catch some swingin' tunes courtesy of Lizzy and the Moonbeams at the Mad River Brewery at 6 p.m. Then perhaps you can hit up Arcata to check out the local art up and the various talented local musicians performing around town. If you're looking for some coffee and some tunes the kids can check out, The Ethniks will be doing their international thing over at Cafe Mokka for free and starting around 8 p.m.

Saturday

Although I live in Blue Lake, I hadn't heard much of the “Blue Lake 2017 Summer Kickoff Event” happening at Perigot Park this afternoon. However, I'm happy to hear that local father/son x2 rock band Doug Fir & the 2x4s will be playing at 1 p.m. I believe it's a free gig, and one that you can bring the kiddos to, so that's a definite plus. Make sure to put on some sunscreen as you may be dancing about longer than you imagine. If you can hang out longer in Blue Lake, walk over to the Mad River Brewery for the local honky-tonkers The Detours, who will be on around 6 p.m. and also for free. Kids are welcome at this one too. Talented local percussionist Sam Kaplan-Good gives me a heads up that one of his bands, Rogues' Gallery, whom he describes as “good ol' boys with original country songs, upright bass and a pedal steel,” will be at The Siren's Song Tavern in Eureka tonight joined by Lyndsey Battle's new trio Daily Driver. So you've got plenty of reason to check out this 9 p.m. show that'll only set you back $5. At the same time, at the top of the hill in McKinleyville, you'll find the rock and blues of locals The Lost Dogs at Six Rivers Brewery. It's a free show, but always feel free to leave a tip if you appreciate the hard-working band. In the event you missed Doug Fir & the 2x4s in Blue Lake earlier, you've got a chance in Loleta tonight at 9 p.m. as they'll be playing at the Bear River Casino for free. It'll be a long day for these fellas, but something tells me that they'll be having a blast at each show. It's cause for celebration tonight as The Alibi is celebrating 14 years of live music right there on the plaza. Music will be starting around 11 p.m. with local “experi-metal” band Dead Man's Tale along with local stoner rockers Ultramafic. Celebrate those keeping the pulse alive for free tonight at The Alibi.

Monday

Although not exactly a live music show in the normal sense in the context of this column, I can't help but spread the word about Humboldt Brews tonight screening a live performance of Pink Floyd live at the KQED studios in San Francisco back in 1970. I remember buying a VHS copy of this performance back on some fan site in the late 1990s and really enjoying this overlooked era of Floyd's career. It's pre Dark Side and post Syd, when Floyd was still experimenting with their acoustic sound. Screening starts around 8 p.m. and is free from what I can tell.

Tuesday

Mad River Brewery employee band The Dusters (sans Crop, I'm told) will be playing covers and instrumentals at — you guessed it — the Mad River Brewery Tap Room at 6 p.m. this evening, and for free. Humboldt Brews welcomes Hawaii-based reggae musician Mike Love at 9:30 p.m. Beginning as a classical pianist as a teenager and then morphing a bit into grunge rock in his later years, Love has fused some rock sounds into his reggae songs with influences as diverse as Bob Marley, Stevie Wonder, The Clash and Patti Smith. He's currently at work on his second album entitled Love Will Find a Way, so expect some songs from this upcoming album with a positive message. It's $10 for this one.

Wednesday

Local guitar wizard Piet Dalmolen returns to the Mad River Brewery at 6 p.m. to dazzle with his solo guitar and looping skills. I recently got to chat with Rico and Justin of Silver Hammer who mentioned that they got Piet to sit in with the band at a recent casino show, so it's safe to say that Piet probably has about 40 Beatles songs under his musical belt. See what happens when you shout out a Beatles tune — maybe he'll take requests. It's a free show, so don't demand too much okay? The Invincible Czars are in town tonight playing their original soundtrack to the classic silent film Nosferatu. The band will set up at the Eureka Theater and perform while the film is playing so you'll be in for a rare treat. The vampirism/music starts at 7:30 p.m. for $10. At Humboldt Brews, they have legendary old-school reggae band The Wailing Souls hitting the stage around 10 p.m., and you can get your groove on with a $25 ticket at the door. ●

Full show listings in the Journal's Music and More grid, the Calendar and online. Bands and promoters, send your gig info, preferably with a high-res photo or two, to music@northcoastjournal.com.

Andy Powell is a congenital music lover and hosts The Album of the Week Show on KWPT 100.3 FM Tuesdays at 6 p.m. He hopes living will be easy this summer.

Aw, Humboldt Roller Derby is turning 10! Celebrate with the teams at the Roller Derby 10-year Anniversary Bout on Saturday, June 10 at 6 p.m. at Redwood Acres Fairgrounds ($15, $12 advance, free for kids 10 and under). After the double-header, say thanks for a decade of fun by buying 'em a drink at the HRD after party at the Shanty from 9:30 p.m. to close.

Thinkstock

Where there's smoke ... there's somethin' tasty on the grill. Follow your nose to Blue Lake Casino for the Redwood Coast Up in Smoke BBQ Competition this Saturday, June 10 from 11:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. ($35, $25 ages 13-17, $10 ages 6-12, free for kids 5 and under). Taste samples from local breweries and barbecue competitors at the Clarke Museum's annual event.

Keep the good times flowing at Rotary Club of Fortuna's Art & Wine in the Park on Sunday, June 11 from noon to 4 p.m. at Rohner Park (free admission, $25, $20 advance for tasting glasses). Sample local and regional wine from more than 20 wineries, browse the arts and crafts market, listen to tunes by the Delta Nationals and feast on oysters, burgers and pulled pork sandwiches.

The Dark Crystal

You're the Puppet

If you're a fantasy nerd, you may have heard about the 10-episode The Dark Crystal prequel coming to Netflix. No? It's happening. To tide us over until its release date (no word yet, but production starts sometime this fall), or if you haven't seen Jim Henson's 1982 classic children's fantasy film, your chance — like Fizzgig — rolls around Sunday, June 11 at 6 p.m. at the Arcata Theatre Lounge ($5).

Conventional wisdom is you either love The Dark Crystal or you hate it. I love it — like, line-quoting, Skeksi-imitating, crystal-shard-tattoo-contemplating fandom. Others, including some of my coworkers, are completely creeped out by the somber story of good vs. evil told with puppets and animatronics. Yes, it's freaky, disturbing and dark in parts but the film's message of harmony and unity among races is uplifting and important. Muppet master Henson didn't think it was healthy for kids to always feel safe. He thought their fairy tales should also at times be a little Grimm.

The film's cinematic effects are stunning, visionary stuff with rich colors and textures created by fantasy artist Brian Froud (who used a lot of spiral and geometric designs to symbolize the connectivity of all things). Then there's the stirring score by Trevor Jones, powerfully executed by the London Symphony Orchestra, and the fact that Henson contended that out of all of his projects, The Dark Crystal was the one he was most proud of. I rest my case.

Planes, Trucks and Stock Cars

Got a preferred mode of transport? Are you a wing man/woman or a gear head? Whatever floats your boat, you've got opportunities this week to see some pretty fly planes, tricked-out trucks and super stocks.

Things get a little over the top when the TRAXXAS Monster Truck Destruction Tour bounces into Ferndale for shows on Friday, June 9 and Saturday, June 10 from 6 to 10 p.m. at the Humboldt County Fairgrounds (adults starting at $20, kids 2-11 starting at $10). With names like Craniac, Skullly and Bad to the Bone, these 10,000-pound, car crushing giants are the WWE stars of the wheelie world. Don't miss your chance to chant "Air! Air! Air!" with the rest of the rowdies.

A bit of history touches down at the California Redwood Coast – Humboldt County Airport when vintage WWII Planes arrive Monday, June 12 from 2 to 5 p.m., Tuesday, June 13 from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. and Wednesday, June 14 from 9 a.m. to 1 p.m. (free to view from the ground, interior tours for donation of $15, $5 children 12 and under, parking is free). ## Reviews

WONDER WOMAN. As much as we shouldn't have to be talking about gender or gender inequality anymore, recent events support the notion that we do. Plodding progress continues to be made but the threat of a systemic course reversal looms. As we plunge blindly into the middle of the 21st century, humanity ought to be on the verge of some kind of enlightenment. In the meantime, though, we've still got all these thousands of years of baggage and Dark-Aged thinking to contend with, so it remains noteworthy that a superhero movie with a female lead (and directed by a woman!) should succeed at the box office. Certainly something to be celebrated, although it may be a little disheartening contextually. Baby steps, I suppose.

On the hidden island paradise of Themyscira, the Amazons, an all-female warrior race anointed by Zeus to defend humanity, prepare ceaselessly for inevitable conflict. Their elite soldiers are schooled and led by General Antiope (Robin Wright). Young Diana (Lilly Aspell), daughter of Queen Hippolyta (Connie Nielsen), finds the rigors of combat training irresistible but her mother adamantly refuses to let her join the ranks. Antiope begins secret lessons with the girl and when Hippolyta becomes aware of this, she embraces the inevitable. Alluding to special attributes unknown to Diana, she implores her general to hold her daughter to a higher standard than any other warrior. Years later, Diana (Gal Gadot) has become the most formidable of all the Amazons. Unbeknownst to her, the outside world has in the meantime become embroiled in hideous conflict with the outbreak of the First World War.

Soon enough, that conflict pierces her idyll, when dashing American agent Steve Trevor (Chris Pine) crash lands a stolen German airplane off the coast of Themyscira. Diana rescues him from the wreckage and he makes her aware of the violence and hatred running rampant beyond their shores. Shortly thereafter, German soldiers pursuing Steve land on the beach and open fire, killing several Amazons. Unable to understand why people would go to such great lengths to hurt each other, Diana becomes convinced that the war marks the return of Ares, the god of war, come to Earth to sow destruction among humanity. She sees it as her calling to accompany Steve to the Western Front and put an end to the fighting.

Meanwhile, German general Ludendorff (Danny Huston) fosters the talents of a maniacal chemist, Dr. Isabel Maru (Elena Anaya) to develop a devastating chemical weapon and win the war, even as the allies and the German high command broach the possibility of an armistice.

Diana and Steve connect with Steve's motley crew: secretary Etta Candy (Lucy Davis), Scottish sniper Charlie (Ewen Bremner), thespian spy Sameer (Said Taghmaoui) and taciturn smuggler The Chief (Eugene Brave Rock). As they make their way across war-torn France, Diana's powers become evermore evident as the bond between her and Steve deepens.

There's quite a lot of expository business going on in the first act and a half or so, and it can honestly get a little burdensome. As good-looking and well-acted as the movie is, the first hour feels laborious in its plotting. Once the plot actually kicks in, though, the pacing picks up, delivering on the deliberately developed earlier parts. Gadot is exceptionally well cast in the lead, balancing toughness with an entirely believable air of empathy and care. Pine plays it charming, as usual, but brings a depth of emotion to his scenes with Diana that adds a vital element to their chemistry. Director Patty Jenkins (Monster, 2003) handles the dialogue and action sequences with equal aplomb, incorporating innovative fight choreography, clever camera moves and beautifully detailed set and costume design.

Though I've long preferred the source material of DC comics to Marvel, I thought until now that the former had essentially missed the boat in translating that material to the screen. Marvel has established its tone and aesthetic so firmly (whether or not it has been entirely successful in so doing is a separate debate) that the DC movies have seemed like darker, slower also-rans. In addition, they've adopted an even more serious attitude and have come off as less fun for it. With Wonder Woman, though, Jenkins et al have established a much more effective union of style and narrative intent. While the subject matter here is certainly Very Serious, it is handled in such a way that it feels genuine and appropriate, rather than pompous or self-important. The message of justice and love overcoming prejudice and hate carries through even as the movie entertains with its outsized battle sequences. Adapters of other comic book properties would do well to study Wonder Woman's fine balance, and to borrow from it. PG13. 141M. BROADWAY, FORTUNA, MILL CREEK, MINOR.
